

Subject Company: OMX AB

On June 21, 2007, Robert Greifeld, Chief Executive Officer and President of The Nasdaq Stock Market, Inc., sent the following email communication to all Nasdaq employees with a link to the attached organizational chart. Also, a substantially similar communication was sent to OMX employees by Magnus Böcker, the Chief Executive Officer of OMX.

From: Bob Greifeld
To: All NASDAQ Associates
Subject: NASDAQ OMX Update

Dear Colleagues,

It's been close to four weeks since we announced our proposed transaction with OMX and in that time we have focused on telling our story and on integration planning. In my recent travels and in discussions with CEOs, investors and others, the feedback regarding this transaction has been overwhelmingly positive. I believe all of our constituents are excited about the possibilities this transaction holds, not only because of the depth of products and services we will offer, but also because it positions us as a leader in the global exchange space.

Since the announcement, we've assembled a group with representatives from both organizations that have been working on the integration planning process. I know that many of you have questions about how the new organization will function and what it means for your respective areas. I am happy to report that we have developed a new organizational structure for the combined company—one that leverages the core strengths of each.

As you know, I will serve as CEO of the new company with Magnus Böcker as President. When you review the organizational chart, which we've placed on Qnetwork, many of the reporting areas and business lines will be familiar, but there are several positive changes to point out.

First, in addition to our existing business units, we have three new core business areas: Transaction Services Nordics, European Growth Markets and Market Technology.

- Transactions Services Nordics will encompass all trading and exchange operations for Nordic-listed securities. Hans-Ole Jochumsen will head this group.

- European Growth Markets is responsible for managing all of our pan-European initiatives, our activities in Central Eastern Europe and the exchanges in the Baltics. Jukka Ruuska will head up this effort.
- Market Technology represents a truly global business opportunity and will lever OMX's existing core technology offerings, which currently comprise more than 60 exchange customers. They will lead all technology offerings and handle sales and account management. This is an important segment and helps differentiate us from many of our exchange competitors. This group will be led by Markus Gerdien.

Next, Corporate Services will operate as stand-alone business line.

- Corporate Services represents an enormous opportunity for us to bring valuable products and services to our combined global client base, not only issuers, but Market Technology clients as well. Marcia Barris will lead this vital area for us.

With respect to technology, we have the greatest responsibilities of any exchange around in that our technology will power a U.S. exchange, the Nordic exchanges as well as the global market technology business. Because of the added responsibility and focus, we've separated this function into two distinct areas:

- Global Software Development will handle all application development for our business areas under the leadership of Anna Ewing.
- Global IT Operations will manage all our infrastructure and application operations under the leadership of Carl-Magnus Hallberg.

This organizational chart represents a first step in how we intend to operate the new company, and I suspect that you'll naturally have additional questions. We will make every effort to update you as the integration process progresses and answer your questions as we move ahead.

The true take away from this is what lies ahead for NASDAQ and OMX. We are creating a truly global exchange company with unparalleled market technology, products and services that no other exchange on the planet has today. I hope you're excited as I am to be part of this incredible period of transformation and opportunity for our organizations and our industry.

Regards,
